And last weekend, it happened to us. We felt like criminals, simply because we challenged the desire of some rich people to keep a coveted slice of beach to themselves.

Legal confusion, meanwhile, hovers over it all. Here, we were strangers. Over the next few hours, at a dozen ostensibly private beaches, my friends and I would encounter better and worse. It didn't matter that my beach companion works for the California Coastal Commission, or that we carried proof we had a right to be. One sobering example of just how far things have gone is a private town in California that maintains its city hall just outside its borders.

Before I could register it, he was winding up and blasting a ball in our direction. basic questions about America itself were woven through their dispute.
