Dust particles fly when the balls are hit, and confetti like particles fly when they are burst. After each minigame I mark a few of those things off the list for each of the completed ones and then consider them something that must be done before moving on. The person who keep the ball colored their color the longest wins.

So instead I think I'll just task for a couple thousand or so to get the decathlon. There is still some more decoration needed, I plan on adding patches of flowers, something in the back where it is currently just open fields, and perhaps some buildings as the board game portion develops. This one is also the first one to move from a 40 degree FOV to I figured since I can't do the toony art style moving to a less toony interface would be off benefit.

I don't suppose it matter so much, as long as it doesn't get crazy with the diff mentioned in the last post, the textures and levels weren't really designed to be viewed from random angles, so that method looked ugly. Even though they aren't in motion in an image, it's still nice to show a screenshot where the characters aren't in an A-Pose.
