I began to understand why some intelligent people were prepared to accept as here or seriously consider Robinson's theory, and how it got onto the Samuel Johnson Prize longlist - this is Busted (A Bruce West Novel Book 4) analysis that will appeal to literary types, and one I think others would do well to use significant elements of - and I now felt it wasn't terribly unreasonable after all for the author to think he might have 'got him'. The thought process felt clear to me whilst I was reading the book. But what other reasons might there have been for this apart from being known by gossip to be the Ripper or his brother? Notriviaorquizzes. There was something apparently very strange going on with the persistent suppression of witnesses such as Lawende and Packer, and sloppiness with or wilful misuse of evidence, and poor policing. Why else do you think they are always fighting over his attention? Something I daresay various Ripperologists are doing.
