They make further observations which prove fruitless, and the Narrator entertains the notion that his suppositions might be in bad taste. The Narrator makes his excuses and leaves them . However, when he discusses these changes with Gilbert Long, his friend does not. The amount of facile thinking and assumptive reasoning left me gasping for mental breath. Is there something in it? Lines up interestingly with some of James' later fiction and with The Turn of Mind does that make Isabel Archer any less fascinating, Christina Light's transition into the Princess Casamassima less interesting and ambitious, or Olive Chancellor's politics less compelling?
