I would say, that you seem to be conflating pop psychology such as positive thinking with the serious professionalism of genuine psychologists and psychotherapists. I want my students to learn maths to the best of their ability, I want them to become excellent mathematicians who pass exams with the highest grades and feel exhilarated by the subject, and by their understanding and knowledge of it.

Infact, the idea of teachers modelling themselves on this could surely be quite good. Therapists are trained over time to master their area of expertise and use it appropriately with people with particular needs. But the answer is not to scrap learning about self. We argue in our new book - The Dangerous Rise Of Therapeutic Education - that, in workplaces, activities to deal with stress, harassment, bullying, appraisal and performance review increasingly focus on emotional responses to work.
