King Charles was a notorious womaniser, who had associations with over a dozen mistresses, but of all these Nell would become his favourite. Arthur Hughes, Ruperta Howe. If the church could not stop these travelling troupes of players, it could at least see to it that they were widely reviled, even by those who paid to see them perform.

This month the London-based library will put on display its copy of a remarkable portrait. Then they had been tolerated more than accepted - lauded for their theatrical talents maybe, but still looked down upon as essentially immoral and of low character. Find out more about this portrait.

Rosalind, from As You Like It is the biggest role for women in the Bard's canon. She was much loved both by the theatre-going public and by her fellow performers. Although some actresses still preferred to use the married title it was no longer necessary, an actress could use the unmarried appellation 'Miss', as in 'Miss Lily Elsie', and it still conveyed the epitome of chaste respectability.
