The first is conceptual: A terrorist act is characteristically the killing or injuring of a random collection of people who happen to be in a certain place at a certain time. Just how certain must we be that terrorism will indeed achieve the goal, while no other method will?

This objection can only get off the ground because consequentialism denies it.

We are morally responsible for the former, but except in certain special circumstances not for the latter. By early it was clear that Germany was not going to win the war, and all subsequent terror bombing lacked moral justification. He planted a bomb at the office of a mining company which, if it had exploded, would have killed or injured a number of people who did not work for the company, but lived in the same building.

Terrorists not only, as a matter of fact, fail to discharge this burden; Fotic Philosophical studies series ; v. Here we have two different conceptions of supreme emergency.
